

Final Exam

CST308: Social Dimensions of Faith and Development

Section: 1

Submitted to:

Professor Samia Huq

Dean, School of General Education

Professor, Department of Economics and Social Sciences

BRAC University, Dhaka

Submitted by:

| Name     | ID       |
|----------|----------|
| Anam Raz | 23104143 |

Date of Submission:

May 18, 2026

Question 1: West and the global South, a critical analysis of religious freedom and governance

In today's political debate it is assumed that the development of voting based democracy and of a liberal, secular understanding of religious freedom is a natural and uniform process. But in the chapter "Varieties of Religious Freedom and Governance: A Practical Perspective," Robert W. Hefner calls this a "made up story" of how diversity has actually evolved in the West. Scholars and policy makers must be careful not to over conceptualize the history of religious freedom so as not to import poorly planned, strongly secular models into diverse societies across the world. It is important to note that religious freedom is not a fixed philosophical concept, but rather a social contract that has been negotiated and is subject to context. When considered in the context of religious freedom as an argument and in comparison to contemporary external scholarship, it becomes clear that religious freedom is not a solid philosophical concept, but is rather a negotiated social contract that is subject to context.

- Hefner's Arguments on the Development of Religious Freedom in the West mentions three main arguments about the evolution of religious freedom in the west in a democracy.

First, he argues that the principle of religious liberty did not lead to a uniform practice of religious liberty in the modern West. On the other hand, it gave rise to a variety of religious forms of government. These regimes were not in the strict sense "liberal" of the modern era, but were tolerant of certain elements of liberalism. In most western European nations, the state created its own religion, and it gave minority religions that were not part of its nationalistic vision. In most western European nations, the state built its own religion and put minority religions that did not fit into its nationalistic vision in a position where they had fewer rights, privileges and ways in which they could express their faith in public (Hefner, 2015). This historical truth is consistent with the critical scholarship on the history of human rights which holds that religious liberty is not an unchanging and clear principle, but a complex concept that is developed in very different and arguing histories (Mahmood & Danchin, 2014). The first formulations of religious freedom in Europe were conceived as a way to secure peace among certain Christian churches, not to ensure that all religions would be treated equally. In addition, as Mahmood and Danchin (2014) have noted, the modern legal right to religious freedom necessarily includes a role for the state in monitoring and governing religious activity. Causing a repeating contradiction between the untouchable nature of one's beliefs and the state's right to restrict how those beliefs are expressed in the public sphere.

Second, according to Hefner (2015), the expressions of religious freedom and religious government that developed in the western states are not necessarily expressions of religious independence and faithful commitment to a preconceived liberal understanding of individual independence is misleading. Instead, such arrangements were a result of local, "path-dependent struggles" between various groups of religious, secular and class interests. All these social groups sought to influence, articulate their interests and public moral values through the institutional structures of state authority (Hefner, 2015). As a result, the resulting systems of religious freedom were structurally underdetermined by abstract philosophical liberalism. Practical, on-the ground balances of social power and economic survival were strong influences on them.

Third, Hefner (2015) notes that civic peace and functional religious tolerance, the hallmark of a peaceful history, especially in religiously diverse societies often depended on group recognition through consociational and community focused pacts, not just individualistic secularism. He mentions the Netherlands as an example of a power sharing government, in which the political system has traditionally been divided into vertical religious and secular "pillars" (verzuilingen). The State resources such as funding for religious education, hospitals and labour unions, among others - were allocated to different groups to ensure religious accommodation and democratization within those systems (Hefner, 2015). This illustrates that security of religious diversity sometimes depends on the acceptance of group independence and equal political strength. Theorized to reduce intergroup hostilities and preserve religious equality in segmented societies, political empowerment of religious minorities through power-sharing frameworks involves distributing power and resources according to religious identity. The theory is that consociational power distributive and resource sharing arrangements on a religious basis can diminish intergroup violence and ensure religious equality in segmented societies (Vaughan, 2018). In such deep diverse settings, the use of power-sharing engineering gives minority groups institutional protection and guarantees their collective survival and social peace not just by the liberal philosophical commitment to the autonomous self alone (Vaughan, 2018).

- Principles and Conditions for Striking a Balance in Europe:

Hefner mentions that in the past, the European states found a way to balance very complicated religious issues and that in the process they developed systems that were not completely engineered in a constitutional manner. In page 130 he clearly mentions the conditions under which these historical settlements were established:

"The framework was instead the incompletely discussed product of social struggles and political pacts among representatives of different religious and class coalitions" (Hefner, 2015, p. 130).

The key to this quotation is that it shows that religious freedom in Europe was an agreed compromise. It was incompletely discussed as much as it evolved in the "noisy environment" of political life and social conflict instead of in the pure atmosphere of philosophical theory. Moreover, Hefner expresses the fundamental principle behind this democratic process as it came to resolution:

"...the history of democratization is not the story of the progressive maximization of any single democratic value, whether the autonomy of the individual or some other, but an evolving balance among several, sometimes discordant, public ethical values along with the social groupings that served as their carriers" (Hefner, 2015, p. 130).

The sentences challenge the goal focused understanding of western political history. The key to success in Europe was for the state to delicately negotiate and mediate among a large number of "clashing" ethical values and to officially recognize the distinct social groups that embodied them. There is no space for simply "tolerating" a diverse society to be successful. Minimalist and uncritical versions of tolerance are not enough for living well with deep diversity. Giving tolerance suggests an arrogant attitude of privilege, and minority people do not want to be tolerated. They want to be respected as having equal status and the full human dignity to which they are entitled (Stewart et al., 2020). Rather, an effective balance needs to be different than a "committed diversity" in which the elements of legal equality and strong neighborly solidarity are not simply declared to be in place but are actually present (Stewart et al., 2020). The leaders of Europe found a working balance in these committed diversity, practical agreements and between diversity and unity.

- Assessment of translatability to the Global South:

Hefner (2015) argues that the lessons learned from Western religious governance, especially the importance of religious freedom as a negotiated process. It's a path dependent process, and a process often shaped by groups is highly transferable to the current context of the "Global South". These areas are now shaped by urbanization, mass education and increased mobility, which are creating new religious and ethical imaginaries. Given that the history of the West shows that religious freedom usually evolved out of a practical handling of group interests and not from the philosophy of secular liberalism, then populations in the Global South will have similar aspirations to a "civic pluralist freedom" (Hefner, 2015). It enables diverse communities to maintain their religious ethical beliefs while also accepting the law that addresses practical issues of deep diversity without obligating the erasure of public faith.

- Personal Agreement and Evaluation:

I totally agree with Hefner's analysis of how these concepts can be translated to the contexts of the "Global South". If religious freedom is defined in the Western liberalist way in an individualistic and non religious manner and it is imported into the Global South, it is often considered as being culturally invasive or imperialist. Religious identity is an integral part of community in many parts of the world including South Asian and Africa, and this reflects community service and civic involvement. The idea that there is a separation between religion and state in the western sense does not seem to serve minorities of religious groups and cultural differences well, as revealed by recent comparative studies of societies with multiple religions. Thus, a balance between collective rights and individual freedoms is needed in order to achieve full civic inclusion (Adam & Akanni, 2023). For example, in religious societies, a mere secularizing approach is considered to be an assault on the national identity. It is challenging in countries like Georgia where diversity is not always aligned with national unity, and a dedicated approach to diversity, inviting interfaith relations to the table as partners of the predominant Orthodox tradition. It is not always the answer of its critics, but it may be the most tolerable solution to minority protection without provoking a reaction or conflict from the majority (Metreveli, 2025).

Therefore it is imperative to keep in mind that religious communities are agents of public ethical values and are the source of interfaith harmony, built on mutual respect to sustain the group. Instead of trying to impose an alien philosophical liberalism on historically community focused societies, adopting a power-sharing or negotiated approach which respects the communal identities is far more effective, legally tolerating them is better. Hefner's concept of civic diversity, on the other hand, is a far more realistic and sustainable blueprint for the Global South.

Question 2: What are the threats to religious freedom in Bangladesh? A legal and sociopolitical analysis

Bangladesh has a deep contradiction when it comes to religious freedom. It was founded on the principle of secularism in 1971, which was one of the basic principles of the first Constitution of 1972, aimed at granting equal rights to all religions. But later military governments and changing political coalitions resulted in the establishment of Islam as the state religion, which posed an inherent contradiction in the constitution. In Bangladesh today, the government has a structure of religious diversity in place, but there are numerous and serious threats to those who are not of the majority faith. Religious division is now a new nationwide agenda on the transformation of the country's society (Masoom & Sarker, 2017), but the situation for minorities is still very bad. The Religious Freedom Landscape Report: Bangladesh (2020) and critical legal review of crimes against religion carried out by Sara Hossain (2004), along with the contemporary literature on minority rights can unveil the key obstacles to religious freedom in the country and what needs to be done to maintain religious freedom.

- Challenges and Threats to Religious Freedom (The RFI Report):

The religious freedom landscape report Bangladesh (2020) by Religious Freedom Institute (RFI) indicates that the threats to religious freedom in the country have deep entrenched roots in both society and institutional neglect. The report spells out certain serious issues that affect the security and human rights of the religious minorities such as Hindus, Buddhists, Christians and Ahmadis, as well as secular intellectuals.

The first point raised by the report is the terrible effects of violent extremism and large scale armed violence. In Bangladesh, targeted attacks have been continuing by radical groups on behalf of religious minorities, secular bloggers, academics and freethinkers (RFI, 2020). Often such attacks occur when there are deliberate rumours spread on social media platforms relating to suspected negative behaviour or "insults to Islam", which then fuel mob violence. As a consequence, there is the destruction of minority homes, businesses and places of worship. A classic example of this type of social discrimination is the targeting of the institutions of minority religions in the attempt to limit their cultural footprint and to stop anyone from openly practicing their religion. Comparative research on institutional religious freedom has demonstrated that specific laws that limit religious institutions of minority religions are effective means of gaining an advantage and controlling other religions in order to be the one that remains competitive (Fox & Finke, 2021).

Secondly, the report draws attention to the fact that the law and state policies are being turned into instruments of repression of freedom of expression. Though there is no explicitly mentioned "blasphemy law" in Bangladesh's statute books. The government is using the broad digital and penal legislation such as the Information and Communication Technology (ICT) Act and the Digital Security Act (DSA) as an indirect blasphemy law (RFI, 2020). There are some less specific and more broadly drafted provisions of these laws that criminalize speech that "hurts religious sentiments. In practice, these laws are utilized to limit the freedom of religious minorities, secular activists, political dissidents and have a marked impact on intellectual freedom.

Third, the report highlights socio-economic exclusion and land grabbing as persistent dangers to minorities survival. The Vested Property Act (from the Pakistan era Enemy Property Act) has been used to systematically take away the Hindu community of their ancestral lands on a systematic basis (RFI, 2020). Despite the enactment of legislation to repeal and return these properties, their implementation is slow and filled with corruption. This results in the nearly endless forced migration and quietly shrinking populations of minorities. In addition, some radical socio-political groups run outside the framework of the state, which is considered a "state within the state" that implements its own sociopolitical conceptions and challenges the secular institutional structure of the state (Ali, 2022).

- Sara Hossain examines persecuted groups, religious injuries, and the court:

Sara Hossain's topic is on persecuted groups, religious injuries and the court. Ahmadis and Advocates: Use and Abuse of Offences Against Religion in Bangladesh by Sara Hossain (2004) is a painstaking examination of how the religious right uses state instruments to articulate and create a single, unbending idea of Islam. Extremist groups have had some success in implementing a "three part plan" through the criminal law, by sowing the seeds of public intolerance, and by organizing mobs to demand new legislation (Hossain, 2004). This is an organised mobilisation that is based on a political theology which sees secularism as a hostile project of a de-religionisation of Muslim societies and calls for counter mobilisation (Belhaj, 2024).

In terms of protection of persecuted groups, Hossain devotes a lot of attention to the Ahmadiyya community, the chief victims of this concerted attack. The religious right has been vociferously pushing for a formal change to the official definition of Ahmadis as "non-Muslims" by the State. In the past, the government has complied with this pressure. For instance, in 2004 when the government issued an executive order to ban all Ahmadi publications, it was a clear violation of the constitutional rights to freedom of religion (Hossain, 2004). The Ahmadis attempt to kick them out of the religion in a legal manner is an attempt at state sponsored religious orthodoxy by extremist groups. The international human rights frameworks guaranteeing the right to existence, collective identity and equality of minority religions place a positive obligation on states to protect religious minorities from majority-led insecurity, such as the Ahmadiyya community (Angeletti, 2021).

As far as religious injury is concerned, Hossain (2004) provides an example of the misuse of very old colonial era laws such as Section 295A of the Penal Code that criminalises deliberate and malicious acts which are meant to outrage religious feelings. These laws are used by the fundamentalists to hunt for secular writers, feminists and intellectuals like Taslima Nasrin or Humayun Azad rather than to maintain peace and order in the society. The religious right is able to frame intellectual dissent or progressive writing as "religious injury" or "abandoning one's religion." The person who has been subjected to extreme harassment is suddenly a criminal defendant facing charges for disrupting public order, essentially reclassified by the State as a suspect. As a result of extreme harassment, the victim of the harassment has become a criminal defendant charged with disrupting the public order, essentially a suspect in the state's eyes.

Lastly, Hossain goes on to explain the crucial but much debated function of the courts. In Bangladesh, the judiciary is the final showdown between secularism of the constitution and the gradual spread of fundamentalism. According to Hossain (2004), the judiciary, namely the High Court and Supreme Court has often served as an important check against majority led dictatorship. For example, the High Court boldly suspended the government ban on Ahmadiyya publications and has been granting bail to those who have been charged with baseless disrespect accusations on a regular basis, in accordance with constitutional provisions that guarantee freedom of speech. But this kind of protection is fragile. Lower courts, magistrates and police are very vulnerable to intimidation by violent mobs and local political pressure. So, the higher courts are trying to uphold the ideals of the Constitution, while the reality on the ground is that the accused faces severe harassment, prolonged detention and physical danger.

- There are three important needs, when it comes to religious freedom:

1. Abrogate repressive speech laws and decriminalise “Religious Injury”:

The principal thing to be done is to alter the legal system that enables persecution. The laws like section 295A of the Penal Code and the non-specific provisions of the Digital Security Act need to be scrapped or significantly amended in order to comply with international human rights principles. These laws will remain in use in the future to suppress minorities and dissenters if the state can still be used to arbitrarily punish citizens for "hurting religious sentiments". The state should not be the final interpreter of religious orthodoxy, and its duty should be to protect its individual citizens instead of abstract religious beliefs and sentiments.

2. Protecting Absolute Judicial Independence and Institutional Protection for minorities:

As Hossain proved, courts are the last line of defence for persecuted minorities. Thus the absolute independence of the judiciary is of great importance, including the protection of lower court judges and magistrates from mob intimidation and political interference. Further, the state has a responsibility to safeguard the institutional freedoms of the minorities. This includes their worship centers, community centers, and their lands, as these institutional freedoms are necessary for the individual religious freedoms of the minorities to exist without being systematically taken away by application of old and antiquated property legislation.

3. Education and Accountability:

The need for Civic Pluralism reform alone is not enough without a change in society. In order to ensure religious freedom is maintained, state actors and civil society must collaborate to challenge religious nationalist narratives that marginalise minority groups. This is a shift from 'tolerance' to civic solidarity. This means reviving the educational curriculum to honour the rich and blended tradition of interfaith harmony in the country. And most importantly, holding the culprits of communal violence to full account in order to break the culture of escaping punishment. True religious freedom flourishes when minority religious groups are not viewed as outsiders, as security risks, but as safe, cultured and secure.

Question 3: The interfaith harmony and the pilgrimage, possession in Malerkotla

The violent partition of the Indian subcontinent in 1947 was one of the most catastrophic communal events in modern history, with the catastrophic divisions of Hindu, Sikh, and Muslim communities along communal lines. But, in the midst of tremendous bloodshed in the Punjab region, Malerkotla, a Muslim majority led princely state, was an extraordinary peace exception. Anna Bigelow's highly important research article on this phenomenon explores this significant exception in more depth, and uncovers how the town's inhabitants collectively enact local history, shared narratives, and inclusive ritual practices to sustain a robust interfaith harmony. She has engaged with Malerkotla for a significant amount of time and her work on the constructed civic success is well synthesized in contemporary open access research (Law, 2015).

1. The Inhabitants Arguments for Harmony: A Dual Blessing:

The people of Malerkotla, irrespective of their religious background, repeatedly describe a common local past of the town in terms of enduring peace and harmony among its residents, rather than a religious one. Bigelow's research looks at the two different but complementary historical narratives to which the residents attribute their safety and unity, the founding blessing of the Sufi saint Haider Shaikh, and the protective grace of the tenth Sikh Guru, Guru Gobind Singh (Law, 2015).

Firstly, the town's name is deeply linked to its founder, the fifteenth century Sufi saint Shaikh Sadruddin, better known as Haider Shaikh. The people say that the saint did not just establish the town in history, but is also present and over it to guard and rule the space. The barakat (divine blessing or spiritual power) of his is considered as physical and spiritual protection over Malerkotla (Law, 2015). His legacy provides a base of civic identity for both Muslims and non-Muslims in the area, as the power of the saint is acknowledged by all the local Muslims, Hindus and Sikhs. The belief of the residents is that any act of communal violence within the limits of the town would be an insult to the saint's hospitality and would bring about spiritually catastrophic consequences.

The second, and perhaps most important is from the historical intervention of Nawab of Malerkotla Sher Muhammad Khan in 1705, which damaged both the Hindu and Sikh population. Sher Muhammad Khan was the only noble who walked out of the court in protest when the Mughal governor of Sirhind ordered the cruel execution of Guru Gobind Singh's two young sons by bricking them alive. His famous haah da naara (cry for justice) was based on the Quran's prohibition against punishing children for their father (Law, 2015). On hearing this protest, Guru Gobind Singh blessed the Nawab, saying that his roots would remain green. As a result, Malerkotla is considered to be a sacred land for the Sikh community. In 1947, when the blood of the Sikhs was being shed, the surrounding communities passively gave Malerkotla a wide berth in keeping with the Guru's blessing. Also to pay the historical debt of compassion, owed to the Guru by the Nawab.

These arguments are so compelling as they are a combination of the local synthesis. The people here don't perceive these Islamic and Sikh stories as mutually exclusive or opposing. Instead, they operate under the "ontological pluralism" that is historically a hallmark of South Asian Sufism, which has been taught to also acknowledge the divine truth and blessing is not particular to any denomination or religious group, but transcends denominational boundaries (Iyer, 2023). If a Muslim is attacked in Malerkotla then it is a blessing of Guru, if a Sikh and Hindu is attacked then it is a peace of Saint. These stories are continually told and the residents are actively building a moral landscape that does not accept interfaith peace as a social choice, it is a religious duty. There are rituals associated with it, such as pilgrimage and possession.

2. The Role of Rituals: Pilgrimage and Possession

There are rituals associated with it such as pilgrimage and possession. History, on the one hand, gives the intellectual and moral structure to peace, while on the other, it is the everyday rituals practiced at the dargah (tomb) of Haider Shaikh that create the physical manifestation and maintenance of peace, highlighting the interfaith harmony that exists between them (Law, 2015). Pilgrimage and spirit possession are important processes for integrating various social groups, and act as a kind of counterbalance to tensions in society.

Pilgrimage as Shared Spatial Choreography:

The shrine of Haider Shaikh is a very resonant sacred space. Recent studies on pilgrimage have revealed how the sacredness of the space is always re-actualized and sustained in the specific physical form of ritual performance of the pilgrims. So that different groups can enact common stories about them and their moralities (Ross, 2021). On one hand, when visiting the shrine in Malerkotla, Hindus, Sikhs and Muslims can carry with them a range of theological interpretations of the saint, while on the other, they perform a common spatial choreography.

They all have to remove their shoes, cover their heads and go round the tomb, make the same offering and bow down before the tomb of the saint (Law, 2015). Furthermore, despite the political marginalization, the believers of Shia Islam have historically adopted the use of sacred soil (turbat) as a material agent of spiritual good and healing (Gerami & Aghagolizadeh, 2025). The pilgrims who visit Malerkotla see the physical manifestations of the shrine as the instrument of the saint's grace. This is not a principle that can be conveyed by words. This is a physical experience that is greater than belief in the form of text. The pilgrimage ritual levels all the pilgrims, and before the immense power of the saint, sectarian differences become immaterial and all become humble supplicants asking for God's help.

The De-Situation of the Levelling of Identity:

The most spectacular and socially impactful ritual performed at the shrine is the occurrence of spirit possession, known as “hazri” or presence. People, mostly women from the lower social strata come to the shrine afflicted with different physical, mental or spiritual ailments that are attributed to having spirits, jinns or black magic. These women enter into trances in the courtyard of the shrine, where their bodies become battlegrounds. Where the possessing spirits engage in a battle with the sovereign power of Haider Shaikh.

This ritual is truly effective in revealing the balancing of social tensions. Firstly, rigid religious boundaries are broken open in a public manner through possession. A Hindu woman may have a Muslim jinn inside her or a Sikh woman may have a Hindu deity inside her. No matter the religion of these spirits, the saint will question and exorcise them, as the final spiritual judge (Law, 2015). The healing power of the saint is universal, and human suffering and divine mercy do not respect the limits of religious communalism.

Moreover, possession is a ritual that challenges male rule and social ranking and hierarchy. In the most conservative societies, females or minorities may not have a voice in the public sphere at all. The materiality of the tomb, however, can at times create a different sensory and spiritual environment, and allow a more intimate connection with the shrine. It allows worshippers, especially females, to become empowered and psychologically comfortable by touching and seeing (Bria, 2025). These people are in possession, so they can express their grievances, attract attention and earn respect. Don't mistake it for the woman speaking, it's the spirit. This is also an illustration of a generic view of “divine feminine” in mystical traditions, where a mystical experience is regarded as feminine and is appreciated by those used to a male-oriented framework of orthodox religion (Milad & Taheri, 2021).

The various groups of Muslims, Hindus and Sikhs who come together to witness a possession become engrossed in an empathy for the person who is possessed. That there is a universal emotional connection which transcends religious divisions when human fragility, suffering and eventual healing are made visible in public. The rituals of the shrine are more concerned with alleviating the suffering of the human person as opposed to doctrinal purity, and this creates a profound practical sympathy. They remind the people of Malerkotla of their common humanity, making a fractured population into a united and strong community which can defy violence of partition.

Reference:

- Adam, A. A., & Akanni, A. A. (2023). A comparative case study of religious identities and civic rights in three Multi-Religious Societies. E-Journal of Humanities Arts and Social Sciences, 1501–1515. <https://doi.org/10.38159/ehass.20234139>
- Hefner, R. W. (2015). Varieties of religious freedom and governance: A practical perspective. In W. F. Sullivan, E. S. Hurd, S. Mahmood, & P. G. Danchin (Eds.), Politics of religious freedom (pp. 127–134). University of Chicago Press.
- Mahmood, S., & Danchin, P. G. (2014). Politics of Religious Freedom: Contested genealogies. South Atlantic Quarterly, 113(1), 1–8. <https://doi.org/10.1215/00382876-2390401>
- Metreveli, T. (2025). (Re)Conceptualizing Covenantal Pluralism in Georgia: Interfaith dynamics on Orthodox terms. The Review of Faith & International Affairs, 23(1), 57–74. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15570274.2025.2454815>
- Stewart, W. C., Seiple, C., & Hoover, D. R. (2020). Toward a global covenant of Peaceable Neighborhood: Introducing the philosophy of covenantal pluralism. The Review of Faith & International Affairs, 18(4), 1–17. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15570274.2020.1835029>
- Vaughan, K. (2018). Who Benefits from Consociationalism? Religious Disparities in Lebanon's Political System. Religions, 9(2), 51. <https://doi.org/10.3390/rel9020051>

Ali, J. A. (2022). Modernity, its crisis and Islamic revivalism. Religions, 14(1), 15.

<https://doi.org/10.3390/rel14010015>

Angeletti, S. (2021). Religious Minorities' rights in international law: Acknowledging intersectionality, enhancing synergy. Religions, 12(9), 691.

<https://doi.org/10.3390/rel12090691>

Belhaj, A. (2024). Contesting power as political theology: Traditionalist Islamic preaching and Post-Secularism in the West. Religions, 15(10), 1197.

<https://doi.org/10.3390/rel15101197>

Fox, J., & Finke, R. (2021). Ensuring Individual Rights through Institutional Freedoms: The Role of Religious Institutions in Securing Religious Rights. Religions, 12(4), 273.

<https://doi.org/10.3390/rel12040273>

Hossain, S. (2004). 'Apostates', Ahmadis and Advocates: Use and Abuse of Offences Against Religion in Bangladesh. Women Living Under Muslim Laws.

Masoom, M. R., & Sarker, M. M. (2017). The Effect of Materialistic Value-Orientedness on Religiosity in Bangladesh: An Empirical investigation. Religions, 9(1), 6.

<https://doi.org/10.3390/rel9010006>

Religious Freedom Institute. (2020). Religious Freedom Landscape Report: Bangladesh.

South and Southeast Asia Action Team.

Gerami, S. M. H., & Aghagolizadeh, Z. (2025). Turbat al-Ḥusayn: Modern Presentation of an Early Shī'ī Practice. Religions, 16(1), 98. <https://doi.org/10.3390/rel16010098>

Bria, G. (2025). Dervish Hatixhe's Veneration in Contemporary Albania: visual representations, devotional practices and sensory experiences. Religions, 16(2), 163. <https://doi.org/10.3390/rel16020163>

Iyer, B. (2023). The Transimmanence of the Real: Ontological pluralism in the School of Ibn 'Arabī. Religions, 14(7), 923. <https://doi.org/10.3390/rel14070923>

Law, C. J. (2015). Fostering an Attitude of Peace: How Malerkotla's Historical Narratives Have Helped Shape Inter-Religious Cohesiveness [Master's thesis, University of Georgia]. UGA Open Scholar. https://escholar.uga.edu/record/17290/files/law\_colin\_j\_201505

Milad, M., & Taheri, Z. (2021). An Inquiry into the Nature of the Female Mystic and the Divine Feminine in Sufi Experience. Religions, 12(8), 610. <https://doi.org/10.3390/rel12080610>

Ross, D. (2021). Retelling Mecca: Shifting Narratives of Sacred spaces in Volga-Ural Muslim Hajj Accounts, 1699–1945. Religions, 12(8), 588. <https://doi.org/10.3390/rel12080588>

Declaration of ethical AI use for assignments

School of General Education- BRAC University

Weight- 5% of the Assignment Grade

Students are instructed to complete this form with sincerity, declaring that they have used AI in an ethical manner and as a learning tool to support the successful completion of this assignment. Completion of this form accounts for 5% of the total grade of this assignment. Failure to submit a declaration or an incomplete form will result in 0%.

AI is a tool to enhance and support your work, not to replace your own critical thinking, analysis, and creative effort. The final product must be a result of your/ your team's intellectual and creative labor. All AI use must be openly declared.

I hereby acknowledge that I have used the following Generative AI tools in the below described capacity to complete my assignment .....Final Exam Assignment..... [name of the assignment] for the .....CST308- Social Dimensions of Faith and Development..... [code and name of the course] course which was due on .....May 18, 2026..... [due date].

Part I: Student-declared AI awareness

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Mention the AI tools that were used as support tools for this assignment(i.e., ChatGPT, Co-Pilot, Gamma, Gemini etc.)                                                                                                                        | Co-Pilot                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| Please write the initial ‘prompts’ you provided to the AI tool(i.e., “I am writing a book review for my course CST301-For the love of food. The book is titled X by Y. Please help me write a well-structured academic review of this book”) | I have attached all the reading documents of my CST course. Please read them carefully and summarize their main theme. I will be writing my Final Exam Assignment on the basis of the attached document in this chatbox. They are a part of my syllabus. Explain each document in a detailed manner. Use simple and easy to understand words. When explaining, do not use jargon, hyphen, or robotic noise. Use transitional words and maintain coherence. |

Part II: Instructor-approved options for AI use (Instructions for faculty: You may revise this list of options to fit your respective course/ assignment)

You are only allowed to use the aforementioned AI tools to support the following activities related to this assignment. Please choose carefully and put a tick against the options you have chosen to use AI for:

- |                                                         |                                                                          |
|---------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Brainstorming Ideas | <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Translating Texts                    |
| <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Generating Outlines | <input type="checkbox"/> Analyzing Data                                  |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Editing Grammar and Style      | <input type="checkbox"/> Generating Visual Aids                          |
| <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Summarizing Texts   | <input type="checkbox"/> Research Assistance (Finding secondary sources) |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Formatting Citations           |                                                                          |

Part III: Instructor-approved AI restrictions (Instructions for faculty: You may revise this list of options to fit your respective course/ assignment)

You are NOT allowed to use AI for the following activities.

- |                                             |                                           |
|---------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------|
| 1. Submitting AI-Generated Work as Original | 7. Violating Assignment Instructions      |
| 2. Paraphrasing (Quillbot etc.)             | 8. Plagiarizing with AI                   |
| 3. Falsifying Citations                     | 9. Automating Group Work                  |
| 4. Producing Unedited AI Content            | 10. Creating Misleading Visuals           |
| 5. Bypassing Critical Thinking              | 11. Submitting AI-Generated Creative Work |
| 6. Generating False Data                    |                                           |

Part IV: Penalties (Instructions for faculty: You may revise this list to fit your respective course/ assignment)

Penalties for these violations include:

- Requirement to revise and resubmit work, potentially with a grade penalty.
- A failing grade on the assignment
- A reduced course grade.
- Referral to the Proctor's Office for disciplinary action

I understand the terms and conditions of this declaration and I hereby acknowledge that the information provided by me on this form is true and correct to the best of my knowledge.

.....Anam Raz, ID: 23104143.....

Name, ID, & Signature of the student